Book Project

1. Unhealthy Democracy: How Partisan Politics is Killing Rural America.

My dissertation book project explores the political causes and consequences of rural health disparities and, in doing so, addresses two related and fundamental political science questions. First, to what extent does partisan control of government shape (health) policy and the health of Americans? And second, why do rural Americans, who tend to live shorter, less healthy lives and have more restricted access to health care, increasingly support a Republican Party that's policies are antithetical to the health needs of rural people and reject policies related these matters? On the former, I show that especially since the 1980s and 1990s, the Republican and Democratic parties have pursued radically different health and social welfare policies, with Republican policymaking leading to worsened rural health outcomes. However, I demonstrate that by appealing to the shared racial and rural identities of sicker and working-class rural whites, the Republican Party increasingly garners support from even the most struggling rural voters—despite the harmful effects of Republican rule.
